

컷 생성 프롬프트 (모델: Seedance 2.5)

A 10-second clay stop-motion scene in 16:9. Handmade plasticine puppets on a miniature architectural-office set, photographed frame by frame. Three shots form one continuous moment.

REFERENCES AND PRIORITY

@Image1 is the exact first frame. Begin with its precise frontal close-up of HEADY: his chin against the table, face and glasses, hair pencil, pencils on image left, sticky notes on image right, blurred shelves, lighting, and framing. Animate from this image without substituting another opening shot.

@Image2 is the bird's-eye floor plan. It fixes the room geography: HEADY at the near end of the table facing the whiteboard; the SUPERVISOR standing to the left of the whiteboard near the door; the laptop side and blueprint-sheet side of the table. Use the plan to orient camera angles, never as a visible shot. Do not render its symbols, colored circles, outlines, or labels.

@Image3 is the empty-room reference. Preserve the door, window, shelves, plants, table, chairs, whiteboard position, architectural models, props, warm light direction, and handmade set design. Its intact tower drawing represents an earlier moment and must not replace the collapsed board in this video.

@Image4 is the exact reference for the whiteboard's current state after the collapse. Match the dusty-blue slab, the faint dark tower outline still visible above, the white clay lines piled in a broad limp heap along the bottom, the upright rough white support on the lower left, and the damaged slanting structure on the right. Keep this arrangement stable in every shot where the board appears. Do not replay the collapse, redraw the tower in white, or tidy the heap.

@Image5 is HEADY's character sheet. @Image6 is the SUPERVISOR's character

sheet. Use these sheets only for exact character identity: face, eyes, glasses, hair, clothing, colors, proportions, and accessories. Never cut to the sheets or render their layouts, labels, dividers, or backgrounds.

FLOW AND SPACE

Cut from HEADY's close-up to his seated point of view toward the far wall, then cut closer to the SUPERVISOR from the same direction. From HEADY's position, the whiteboard is ahead and the SUPERVISOR stands to its left. Preserve the door-to-whiteboard relationship, the window side of the room, the table's orientation, and the lighting through both cuts. Camera movements remain smooth; puppet gestures retain a gentle frame-by-frame cadence.

Shot 1 — HEADY frontal close-up, 3 seconds:

Start exactly on @Image1. Without lifting his chin from the table, HEADY releases a faint, tired sigh and blinks twice in quick succession, then resumes his vacant forward stare. Keep the movement small and natural. His glasses, hair pencil, tabletop pencils, and sticky notes remain where they are in the first frame.

Shot 2 — HEADY's seated point of view, 3 seconds:

Cut to HEADY's view across the same meeting table toward the whiteboard. The tabletop and its near edge occupy the lower foreground, with some of its existing props visible. Show the SUPERVISOR standing to the left of the board near the door. His face, torso, and gestures are clearly visible, while the table naturally occludes part of his lower body from HEADY's seated eye level. Do not frame this as an unobstructed head-to-foot view. The collapsed design behind him matches @Image4, including the white heap and left support. Already mid-explanation, he speaks with mild irritation, points toward the failed design with white clay chalk, and opens his free hand for emphasis. He remains in the same position, and his gestures do not continually obscure the changed board.

Shot 3 — SUPERVISOR close-up, 4 seconds:

Cut closer from the same viewing direction while he continues the same speech and gesture. Small handcrafted clay architectural components appear close to his moving mouth and slowly drift outward: tiny beams, braces, columns, and building blocks. They spread gently in several directions at different depths, as though HEADY's drifting attention has turned the explanation into miniature objects. These pieces have physical clay texture and volume. They are not letters, words, subtitles, a speech bubble, or graphic overlays. Keep the SUPERVISOR's identity and mildly exasperated expression exact; let his face soften slightly in focus as the nearest floating components become sharp. The whiteboard remains in its collapsed state behind him, even if blurred. End while the pieces are still floating. Their appearance is subjective to HEADY, not a permanent change to the room.

STYLE

Warm diffused light from the room's established window side, gentle fill, soft shadows, creamy highlights, restrained earthy browns, beige, dusty blue, lavender, and muted green. Photographed physical miniature quality with fingerprints, thumb dents, joined seams, sculpted hair, and imperfect rounded forms. Quiet, empathetic, slightly dopey comedy. No polished CGI, extra characters, duplicate puppets, extra limbs, captions, character-sheet imagery, floor-plan graphics, logos, or watermarks.

SOUND

No music and no intelligible dialogue. Quiet office room tone and HEADY's small sigh in Shot 1. In Shot 2, the SUPERVISOR's speech is a low, emphatic but indistinct murmur, with faint chalk and sleeve sounds. In Shot 3, his voice grows softer and less distinct from HEADY's perspective; the drifting clay components make only delicate, sparse taps. No explosive sounds or dramatic whooshes.